

Our behavior even in the smallest act depends upon our attitude towards issues of the largest scope. Our true attitude in one situation will be expressed just as truly as in another for the basis of all development upon which a genuine attitude rests does not alter with the situation confronted - though it is always subject to deterioration or improvement.

It is our larger views which govern our routine actions, which makes all actions - whether large or small in the eyes of the world - equally important not as performances but as attitudes in which they are performed. But if our understanding which is principally feeling does not rise above the street level of thought and emotion, our consciousness lives in a cellar. And when one lives in a cellar, one has to burn much artificial light or remain in the dark.

If we
